I chose the topic of the One-Child Policy because I was intrigued by an event that heavily influenced my life, and many other Chinese children's lives too. Not much is known about my birth, only that it was somewhere in China. (I was one of the two baby girls mentioned in the news article on the Impact page of my website), abandoned possibly due to the policy. I was lucky to be adopted into America, but I will always wonder who my birth parents are. So, I was thinking about that when it hit me that the subject of the One-Child Policy fit the criteria of rights and responsibilities.

I first started with what I knew about the policy: each family could only have one child or else they would be punished in some way, shape, or form. From there, I started to get into the details about why the One-Child Policy was implemented, what China's goal was in the 1970s, and who was affected by it. I watched the documentary, "One Child Nation" by Nanfu Wang, which is where I got many of my quotes. Also, my parents have friends in the States who were born in China during the policy, and I had the opportunity to interview one of them about her and her husband's childhood experiences of having a sibling in China.

I spent some time learning how to use the website builder. I planned out the number of pages and what each page would contain, and started with a framework. I then added the quotes I would have on each page. From there, I filled in some context with my own words and added images, before organizing it all. Finally, I completed my bibliography, and then this process paper.

My thesis: The Chinese government, in its responsibility to manage the nation's economic welfare and control rapid population growth, implemented the One-Child Policy, restricting individuals' reproductive rights. This policy highlights the tension between state responsibilities and citizen rights, ultimately shaping China's future demographic landscape.

The One-Child Policy of China had, has, and will continue to have large impacts on its demographics and economic development. China now has a declining workforce. This is detrimental for their economic growth in the long run because they won't have enough people working to keep everything "made in China." Such decline can give way to other rising world powers, which could shift the international power dynamics. Furthermore, there are also population imbalances with millions more men than women and more elderly than children. The policy has impacted many and will continue to have widespread effects on China and the world.
